

On November 2nd, Tri-Cities voters will be asked to vote on a municipal utility offering cable TV, internet and telephone.

Supporters claim it won't cost you a cent.

Are you willing to bet your tax dollars on it?

Referendum proponents still haven't offered a business plan for their risky venture. Who is going to pay for developing a business plan or for the expenses to market the proposed system to potential investors?

They offer only vague promises that private investors will come up with the cash so taxpayers wouldn't have to foot the bill. But what kind of investor will invest in a project that is, at best, projected to break even?

If revenues come up short of projections and investors bail out, who will make up the difference?

What will any shortfall mean to municipal services? Our utility rates?

Is municipal broadband worth the risk?

Vote No On The Municipal Broadband Referendum On November 2nd.
